Dr. Wade will share research about how trauma is affecting Philadelphia's urban population and how the city's community-level systems are working to improve health outcomes. Stay for a one-hour Q&A session and conversation about how Philadelphia's model can inform efforts to improve health and reduce disparities in the Twin Cities. Sam Simmons, leading experts on adversity and health in urban and African American communities, will facilitate the conversation.

Dr. Roy Wade, Jr.

Is a pediatrician from Children's Hospital of Philadelphia who specializes in the connection between adverse childhood experiences and urban issues such as poverty, violence and health problems. He is a co-creator of the Philadelphia Urban ACE Study.
